1. Peter Pfeifer, a Bavarian and a former German career diplomat, was scheduled to succeed Forstner as head of the Friedensburo on 1 April 1950, at which time that office was to be incorporated into the Bonn Government as the Research Office for Foreign Affairs. As chief, Pfeifer will be responsible for all research and planning in the field of foreign affairs, including the education for foreign service of young German political students.
2. Trainees for the future German foreign service will study for one year at an institute in Speyer to be sponsored by the Research Office for Foreign Affairs. The first class begins on 1 April 1950. The students, who will be trained for foreign service or political activity at Bonn, or both, must have the following qualifications:
 - a. University training.
 - b. Fluent knowledge of English and French.
 - c. No political taint.
3. Pfeifer views the conversion of the Friedensburo into the Research Office, and the establishment of the foreign affairs institute, as the first steps toward the creation of a Foreign Office, and he hopes to be the first incumbent of the post of Secretary of Foreign Affairs in the Bonn Government. He believes that in the near future all questions of remilitarization will be handled in the Research Office.
